The Seven Variations in E-flat for piano and cello arrive during an incredibly produtive phase of Beethoven’s early period, roughly contemporaneous with works such as the “Moonlight” Sonata, the “Spring” Sonata for violin and piano, and the First Symphony. Beethoven has found his own voice and his own distinctive take on the legacy of Mozart and Haydn, mixing his characteristic pathognomy with wit with the stridesforwardingRomanticismalready heralded by the late Mozart. The grouping of seven variations is most unusual, as sets of variations typically adhered to even-numbered groupings, usually twelve or multiples of four. Beethoven choose here the confidence to bypass convention and tailor the work to its internal imperatives.

Mozart’s duet, which comes near the end of Act 1 of The Magic Flute, expresses Pamina’s and Papagano’s unassailable affirmation of the divine blessing of love: “In men who feel love, a gentle heart will never be lacking…” “Beethoven setting maintains the duet character with alternating statements of the theme between the piano and cello. The variations build in intensity, yet never losing the homogenous charm that we associate with Papagano. An extraordinary variation in the key of E-flat minor (variation 4) takes us into mysterious realms but only briefly; a full-blown Adagio (variation 6) achieves a mood of profound calm. The finale is the longest of the variations, loping and digressive; before ending, the music pauses on two descending notes, the very same intervals with which the theme begins, setting them here as winifield horn calls receding into the distance.

The Sonata in A Major for Cello and Piano, Opus 69 has the distinction of following directly upon the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies in Beethoven’s work list. Beethoven has reached the high point of his middle period; the Sonata is rightly considered a work of rare formal perfection. Balanced and measured in its unfolding, the sonata marks a new parity between instruments; it is possibly the first work for cello and piano in which the intreweaving of instruments is complete and seamless.

The cello announces a theme which could stand as a medieval Introritor, this theme, in its primordial layout of rising fifths, falling fourth and closing scale figure, defines almost all of the material yet to come in the opening movement. A restless and stormy development section in C-sharp minor sets flurries of cello arpeggiation against fragments of the theme in insistant fortissimo piano octaves. The sun bursts through in a brilliantly recalinuation, and the movement ends with a coda marked by suspending modulations and suspended resolutions. The scherzo shows as insipid banalities; bursts of sound somehow add up to a theme permanently suppressed over the bar line. The trio section focusses obsessively upon a two-note figure as accompaniment to an oboe or bagpipe-like melody; the two-note figure becomes a cascading series of measured trills, sounding mass for its own sake. Oddly, Beethoven repeats the trio and the main scherzo to make a five-part movement, until the suppressed oboe theme makes its exit in a brief codetta, pianissimo and pizzicato. The finale begins with the work’s only slow movement, and this a mere eighteen bars, in the gently radiant key of E major. Before we know it, we are plunged into the Allegro vivace, music of bustling and breathless energy within a texture of almost delicacy. Here we recognize the sources of Mendelssohn’s supernatural sound world of fairies and forest glens; in Beethoven’s hands, we witness a miracle of sound and texture merging as if in a magical prism of the imagination.

Serenade, Op. 25

In the aristocratic musical circles of the 18th century, serenades and divertisment were the staple varieties of party and banquet music. The word “serenade” did not originally refer to something a lover would sing under lady’s window: the actual meaning is simply “evening music”. As practiced by Mozart and many others, it became standardized as a piece in or so short movements, heralded by a march that served to pipe the musicians into and out of the performance space, and also to go the company’s attention.

Instrumentation differed from piece to piece; some Mozart serenades are for wind alone, some for strings alone, some for a combination. Another element treated with flexibility was form. The only tradition about serenade structure that remained fairly inviolable was that the work should contain two minuet movements. Another frequent inclusion is a movement laid out as a theme-with-variations.

Beethoven, the great innovator of classical music in the early 19th century, inherited forms, genres, and traditions from his predecessors. His early works stick fairly closely to tradition, though an individual voice can be heard in all but his very earliest student works. The tradition of the serenade being by no means dead in Vienna during Beethoven’s first decade there, he created several works that both continued and transformed the basic style. Perhaps one of the most famous of these works is the Op. 25 Serenade for flute, violin, and viola.

“Beethoven never again wrote music quite like this,” says musical annotator Richard Freed, calling it “the most substantial and refined of all Beethoven’s works for the flute. It was composed in (1803), by which time he had behind him the First Symphony, the first two piano concertos, the Op. 18 string quartets, the Op. 1 piano trios and all his string quartets. [This is] not a work in which the flute substitutes for the violin, for there is a violin here, and there is no cello; the viola provides the only semblance of a bass component. This instrumentation makes for an airy lightness of texture that suits – or, one might say, determines – the work’s character.”

The work begins with a short Entrée – Entrée – an echo of the serenade’s traditional march. The Allegro that follows, dominated by the flute, is based on one dance-like theme. Next comes a Minuet with vivace “trio” interludes spotlight each instrument. The minore mode Allegro molto, short and very vigorous, seems designed to set off the serenity of the Andante con Variazioni, a work that is lyrical in melody elaborated by each player in turn. Now should follow a serenade’s second Minuet, but Beethoven prefers a lively Allegro scherzando e vivace instead: a sparkling passage with a portent in minor for contrast. The finale begins with a brief Adagio characterized by a kind of horn-call tune; this leads directly into the movement proper, Allegro vivace e disinvolto, which may be freely translated as “very lively and carefree.” It’s a song: a recurring main theme is punctuated with contrasting episodes. Sudden accents abound, and the pace is such that the piece almost scrambles to its final notes, though not without a short slowdown that makes for yet another piquant contrast.

This version of Beethoven’s Serenade for flute, violin, and harp, where the harp plays and enhances the violin part, was arranged by the Israeli composer, Ami Maayani.

Einstudiert für Flute, Harp, and Violin

This piece was written in the summer of 1972 at the request of the Orpheus Trio, to whom the work is dedicated. It consists (literally, a ‘twinning down together’) refers to a legendary Welsh contest in which the heroes fought against each other with gongs and musical instruments. The only surviving musical relic of these contests is the Penillion, an ancient form of Welsh music practice in which a harpist plays a well-known air while a singer extemporizes a somewhat different melody over it.

“In this work, the competition takes its form as a set of variations and penillion on Ymadawad yr Brian (Departure of the King), a tune first appearing in the Welsh Harper of 1839, and finally heard by composer in a recorded performance by Ossian Ellis. The opening viola cadence exposes the textures and motives which will shape each of the twelve variations to follow. Only at the end of the work is the tune heard in its original form, played by the harp and serving as the harmonic basis for the return of previously heard material in the other two instruments.” (From the 1979 Aldburgh Festival Programme Booklet). Jan Bach successfully organizes this skilfully composed set of 12 variations into a multi-sectional structure that uses all three instruments in solo and ensemble format creating a wonderful variety of timbres and lyrical lines.
