Synopsis

1. It is the middle of the night. Sarah, asleep, is disturbed by a presence that she cannot see. She searches through the house and retreats to her chair. A sound awakens her and she struggles to speak. She cannot rest and walks through the house, haunted.

2. Finding nothing, Sarah summons her servants, hours before dawn. She asks about construction on the house, and sets the servants to work. She demands to hear the sound of hammers working and asks what she needs to build next.

3. A Tour Guide appears with several tourists and begins to recount Sarah’s story, much to her surprise. He describes the marvels of her house, including the “Door to Nowhere” and before her eyes, the tourists transform into a party of raucous ghosts.

4. The Ghosts and Sarah sing a children’s song.

5. Sarah begins to tell her story. She knows nothing about life after death, but cannot ignore the countless numbers of the dead. She recalls a time in her life when numbers were a simple children’s game. She describes her beautiful house as if in a dream, while her servants try to wake her from her reverie, pointing out what is decaying around her.
6. The Tour Guide takes the group into the séance room; he antagonizes Sarah by disclosing her constant need for forgiveness, and reveals that she often wanted to speak to Annie, her dead daughter. He describes ghostly workers whose labors never cease, seen throughout the house. The Ghosts affirm that the haunting “happens all the time.”

7. The Ghosts speak. The story they tell has nothing to do with spirits or legends. “There will be boots beneath a desk.” “A door wouldn’t open.” “A door wouldn’t close.” “The sound of breathing - but not from the dead.” They ask: “How many more rooms?” “How many times?” They state: “Here is the door to nowhere.”

8. Sara shares the memory of holding her infant daughter as an enormous flock of passenger pigeons passed by. She hopes that her baby might have heard the rushing of wings and felt a sense of awe. Now passenger pigeons are extinct and her baby daughter is long dead. Sara struggles to make sense of it all.

The Tour Guide interrupts and spins another myth about Sara’s fear of ghosts and her “madness”. In reply, Sara asks whether it is madness to mourn the dead. She asks us how it is possible to drift through the same rooms and say the same words day after day, forgetting the dead are there.

9. The Ghosts describe the assembly of a gun; the Tour Guide continues his endless tour; Sarah continues to state that she is trying to bear the dead in mind.

10. Sara shares a final story.
