Program Note

This sonata, written in 1789, is Mozart’s last. Like other late works by Mozart, it is highly contrapuntal and chromatic. The exuberant first movement is unusual in its frequent canonic development of the opening trumpet-like figure. The second movement, in A major, is in three parts, with a middle section in the relative minor. The finale is a rondo with elements of sonata form (ABACABA with the C section functioning as a development).

Igor Stravinsky (1882-1971): Sonata (1924)
The Piano Sonata is a great early example of Stravinsky’s neoclassical style, whose austerity and dry wit make a sharp contrast with the dazzling colors and wildness of the early ballets. Stravinsky, inspired by Bach, Haydn and Beethoven, severely limits his compositional and pianistic palette. As he wrote in Poetics of Music:

> My freedom will be so much the greater and more meaningful the more narrowly I limit my field of action and the more I surround myself with obstacles. Whatever diminishes constraint diminishes strength. The more constraints one imposes, the more one frees one’s self of the chains that shackle the spirit.

Franz Schubert (1797-1828): Sonata in A minor, D. 845 (1825)
This early Romantic work teems with invention and innovation. Schubert stretches sonata norms with daring key changes and strikingly irregular rhythms. He also allows the dramatic narrative of the work to unfold at its own leisurely pace, making this work longer than the previous two combined. The rhetorical qualities of the music are highlighted by dramatic uses of silence and repetition. The first movement treats traditional sonata form in ways that feel almost experimental, covering a wide range of character and emotion. The second movement is a set of five charming variations, each with a different rhythmic subdivision. The scherzo is playful, humorous and rhythmically impetuous. The finale is a rondo with a moto perpetuo alternating with more dramatic and lyrical sections.
